George B. Barabas's Statue of Lincoln.

"The" I'm inclined to think that there are in the ordinary course of things a certain amount of truth in the following statement: "Every man is a king in his own eyes, and the people who remain in power are the people who can read the minds of kings." I think that's true, although it may not be quite accurate. I don't think any of us can read the minds of kings, but I do think that we can understand them, and I think that we can understand them better when we understand their motives.

down the river a few days after the episode, when they passed the sixty or so stone-built huts which Mr. Stanin had established for his workers. "They lived in a kind of nomad life," Mr. Stanin told the New York Times reporter, "and lived a very hard life."

Lindbergh: In the end, both the President and the Cabinet were convinced that they had made a mistake. The President issued a statement saying that he had been in Washington on business, and that he had not known about the incident. The Cabinet was also divided, with some members arguing that the decision to leave Mr. Lindbergh out of the cabinet was a mistake.

The incident marked a turning point in the relationship between the President and the Cabinet. From that moment on, the President began to rely more on the advice of his closest associates, rather than on the Cabinet as a whole.

When asked about the incident, Mr. Lindbergh responded: "I have nothing to say about this. I am not prepared to discuss the matter any further."
