Prohibition Leaders in the Senate and House of Representatives

Congressman Joseph E. Brown of Louisiana, with Representatives Thomas G. Patten of Missouri, Rep. Fred. Holt of Texas, and Congressman Thomas B. Stephens of New York, led the opposition to the Eighteenth Amendment. They argued that it was unwise to acquire a small piece of property in the national debt in order to avoid a larger debt in the future. They contended that the amendment was a violation of the Constitution and a threat to the rights of citizens. They also believed that it would not achieve its goal of prohibition and would only lead to an increase in illegal alcohol sales.

Leading the opposition to the Eighteenth Amendment in Congress were men who had opposed Prohibition for years. They included Representatives Thomas G. Patten of Missouri, Rep. Fred. Holt of Texas, and Congressman Joseph E. Brown of Louisiana. They argued that the amendment was a violation of the Constitution and a threat to the rights of citizens. They also believed that it would not achieve its goal of prohibition and would only lead to an increase in illegal alcohol sales.
