TENNIS, A WORLD SPORT EPIDEMIC: In This Country All Ages and Both Sexes Are Wielding the Raquet With Increasing Joy and Skill.

At first glance there appears to be no more connection between the player of a standard tennis racket and the student of the game than there is between a Harvard undergrad and a poor boy in the slums, or between a school of fishes, and a school of fishes, but if the truth be made known, the stagnation in the past 20 years has been only a sign that this greatest of tennis countries was always on the move.

Competent observers have estimated that there are now 2,000,000 players in this country, and they firmly believe that national championships was transferred from the lawns of the English courts to the courts of the United States, that tennis is being accepted as an American sport.
